Q 1 Read the text to answer the questions below: (..)

Education Ministers who are hoping to improve their school systems often look at Finland and Taiwan. The first is a small country in northern Europe with a cold climate and a language hardly anyone else speaks; the second is a very small island that until fairly recently had high levels of poverty and population. Yet today both of these countries come out at or near the top in international surveys of economic success. Year after year, they also score highly in educational results. Can this be an accident, or is there a connection?

Finnish Education Minister Tuula Haatainen certainly believes there is. 'In Finland, we believe we have to invest in education,' she says. One reason she offers for Finland's success is that students don't begin 'real' school until they are 7, and all students between 7 and 16 get the same education. 'We don't divide at an early stage between students who do well and those that don't manage so well,' she explains. 'Studies show that it is dangerous to divide too early into different educational paths.'

Like Finland, Taiwan has nine years of compulsory education, after which (in both countries), students choose either an academic or vocational path. Very few choose to leave school in either country. One important difference, however, is in national tests, which are very important in Taiwan but much less so in Finland.

Can other countries learn from the Finnish and Taiwanese experience? There are surely some lessons that can be learnt as long as we remember that just applying one country's system to another isn't a simple solution to all problems.
